

The FCC must publicly air the issues associated with consolidating media ownership in the United States. The airwaves belong to the people -- not to a handful of huge corporations.

There is a real danger that the American people are going to be systematically deprived of valuable information which the people need to be able to understand what is happening in the world and in our own supposed "democracy". This is already happening, and will only get worse if the FCC relaxes the ownership concentration rules. We need a public debate on this hugely important subject. I am very suspicious of the motives for railroading these changes through. It seems that disempowering the people by removing their sources of knowledge is the motive!
